Course Synopsis

The 21st century workplace is a stressful environment. Rapid technological advancement has resulted in pressure to learn things quickly and major disruptions in goods, services and markets. To avoid being left behind in this 'digital divide', companies have been scrambling to adapt, resulting in a slew of cost cutting measures, such as downsizing, geographical relocation of operations and divesting during mergers and acquisitions.

These measures have multiplied the stress on employees as they not only have to deal with the lack of job security, but also come more frequently into the orbit of new colleagues who may have contrasting values, beliefs, preferences, expectations and working styles.

As long-term exposure to stress can lead to strains on mental and physical health, it is imperative for employees of today to be resilient under stress to be able to thrive in our volatile world, lead an orbit of new colleagues who may have contrasting meaningful life and most importantly to avoid burning out.

In this course, learners will have the opportunity to study the differences between resilient and non-resilient attitudes and behaviours through case studies.

Learners will also receive practical tips on the requisite cognitive processes needed to create their personal resilience blueprint to enable them to bounce back from adversity quickly to turn stressful situations into opportunities for personal growth and enhancement.
